Strippable

The important "strippable finish," used commercially, is seldom seen by the public. When it is applied to surface, it dries to form a finish that can be peeled off when desired. Its use reduces labor, saves time, and cuts costs in a wide range of industrial applications. Such a finish is used as protective masking in connection with spray finishing. In automobile refinishing, for instance, the windows can be coated with a strippable finish. After the job is finished, the coating can be stripped from the windows, leaving them clear of any unwanted spatters. Such finishes are also used in the protection of parts of products in fabrication, shipment or storage.

Houses and Barns Now Match

Many people have speculated on the reason why barns were always painted red in the old days. The explanation, according to paint experts, is that red paint was cheapest and most easily obtained in those days. These factors were important as a barn absorbed a great deal of paint because of its rough surface. Nowadays other colors are as inexpensive as red and the planed siding of modern barns takes paint just as easily as the clapboards of a house. Consequently, most barns are today painted with the same material as the adjoining house and in a color which matches or harmonizes with it

Safer and Cheaper Water Purification is Predicted

Safer, more economical fluoridation of municipal water supplies for the prevention of dental decay is promised by a self-policing new chemical.

The new substance, called Flural, is much less poisonous than the fluoridating agents now in use, and therefore can be handled by water plant personnel with much less danger, according to Dr. Wayne E. White of the Ozark-Mahoning Company, Tulsa, Okla. None of the agents presents any hazard to the water consumer, Dr. White emphasized because they are so greatly diluted by the time they pass through the reservoirs and come out of the tap Flural is self-policing in the sense that it will release fluorine to the water only so long as the concentration of the anti-dental-decay element is below a certain safe maximum, Dr. White explained. If the water has a fluorine content of more than about 1.5 parts per million, however, the Flural will reverse its action and begin to remove the fluorine, he said.

Flural, the chemist said, is a fluorine-containing alum complex which is readily soluble in water. Its low toxicity is of great importance to water plant personnel who must handle large amounts of the fluorine compounds.

Longer Life Span Poses Big Problem for Industry

If industry continues its present retirement practices, it will be faced with a seriously depleted labor pool and top heavy pension costs.

This opinion was expressed by Dr. S. Charles Franco, associate medical director of the Consolidated Edison Company of New York. Dr. Franco spoke before the Section on Preventive and Industrial Medicine and Public Health at the annual meeting of the American Medical Association.

He cited the increase in life expectancy since the turn of the century. The number of people age 65 and over has quadrupled whereas the population has only doubled, he pointed out.

Today, one out of 12 persons is over 65 years of age," he said. "By 1975, this number will soar to one out of every nine persons. The gap between retirement and death now stands at 5½ years, about double the length in 1900. Under the present trend it will have tripled by 1975."

Unless industrial retirement policies are changed, Dr. Franco said, the individual worker will be faced with increased years of inactivity and with a drastically reduced income, under conditions which are psychologically and physically degenerative.

"The fact is widely recognized and accepted that it is not a worker's chronological age which necessitates his retirement at age 65, but rather the physical disabilities which normally accompany advanced age," he added. "Our aim, then, should be to free workers, as much as possible, from these disabilities."

He urged rehabilitation of workers of any age who are chronically disabled by such medical conditions as heart disease, hemiplegia, arthritis and tuberculosis so that their remaining physical capacities may be used and their working life-span lengthened.

Put Children in Proper Frame of Mind at Bedtime

Child psychiatrists and psychologists all advocate pleasant meal-time discussions for children. Laughter makes the food digest more quickly and more easily than anger. Childish or parental squabbles and scoldings at mealtime tend to upset the digestive systems, doctors say. The same psychology should apply to bedtime, then, too. Back in 1900 a doctor published a book stating that "if there ever is a time when children should be treated kindly and talked to pleasantly, it is in the evening before retiring or after they are in bed." And in this manner, times haven't changed one bit since 1900.

Children should be taught that going to bed is pleasant. They should never be scolded or reprimanded and then put to bed, for then the bed becomes a symbol of punishment. This tenseness, nervousness and anger which arises interferes with the child's sleep.

The time before the children retire should be devoted to quieting them down. A session of reading or other mild diversion conditions them for "lights out." They definitely shouldn't be allowed to play strenuously before retiring, for while it is fun and wears them out, it also excites them and causes them to be tense rather than relaxed.

Word Experts

The average high school senior in America has a larger vocabulary than William Shakespeare used in all of his published writings! According to experts, "the average high school senior has a total vocabulary of approximately 80,000 words, made up of about 46,500 basic words and an estimated 33,500 derived words." They point out that "various scholars (who have) counted the number of different words used by great writers in all of their published works have found the total number for Shakespeare to be 15,000 (basic) words." Total vocabulary for children of other school grades, including basic and derived words, is given by Dr. Seashore and Mrs. Bell as follows: first grade, 24,000 words; third grade, 44,000 words; fifth grade 51,000 words; seventh grade, 85,000 words; ninth grade, 62,500 words; and eleventh grade, 73,000 words. Basic vocabulary for the four-year-old has been estimated, on the basis of recent studies, at 5,500 words.

TV Popularity Rising

Television is growing in popularity among teen-age youth at the expense of movies, reading and radio. That is the finding of a Northwestern University professor of education, Dr. Paul Witty, who surveyed the high school students of two Chicago area suburban communities, Oak Park, Ill., and River Forest, Ill. Prof Witty's study revealed that 44 per cent of the students interviewed now attend movies less frequently than before the advent of television. Fifty per cent attend with the same frequency as before, and only two per cent go to the movies more frequently. The Northwestern educator also found that one-third of the students read less than before TV, although the survey showed the literature to be of relatively high quality.

Color and Fabrics

Fabrics and color take on added importance in this year's dual purpose sleep equipment. Green shades for predominance in the color field, with medium greens the most popular. Grays and reds are seemingly battling for second place in the color scheme, with browns, cocoas and golds gaining favor rapidly. Patterns also take on added importance. Bright or pastel plaids, geometric and other modern designs, tweedy effects and florals are vying for honors in the dual purpose field, particularly for studio couches and sofa beds. Plastics, simulating alligator and other leathers as well as textured fabrics are taking on new importance. With the emphasis in homes being placed on ranch type houses, Western motifs are fast becoming favorites. Cowboy and covered wagon patterns are animating and carrying out this style of architectural popularity. Dual purpose bedding has always been able to fit into almost any room of the house because of its smartness of design. Now, however, with its additional attraction of extra selections in design and color, it is in even more demand.

Recommend Use of Penicillin Ointment in Eyes of Newborn

Silver nitrate solution, the preparation now being used in the eyes of newborn babies to prevent infection, may be replaced by penicillin ointment, as the result of a recent study. (Silver nitrate is required by law in many states.)

Drs. H. H. Davidson and N. J. Eastman and Sanitarian Justina H. Hill of Baltimore, recommend that penicillin ointment be used in the eyes of newborn infants in preference to silver nitrate because, in their opinion, it is "the most efficacious, the safest and least irritative agent" for this purpose.

Dr. Davidson is on the staff of Johns Hopkins University and Hospital and is also senior assistant surgeon, United States Public Health Service.

Laws requiring the use of silver nitrate are a precautionary measure to protect newborn babies from gonococcus eye infection. Such an infection — which can easily be transmitted at birth to an infant by a gonorrhea-infected mother— could result in serious eye damage or blindness.

The doctors expressed the opinion that, where necessary, regulations governing the use of silver nitrate should be changed "to permit the use of penicillin ointment in hospital practice when the physician prefers it to silver nitrate."

These recommendations come as a result of their study of three different methods of eye care at Johns Hopkins Hospital—penicillin ointment, penicillin intramuscular injections, and silver nitrate. Each method was used in rotation for a week at a time. During a two year period, 4,163 infants were treated with one of the three methods.

All three methods proved equally effective in preventing gonococcal infection, they reported, but the incidence of eye irritation varied greatly.
